page 11 agree to recognize the independence of Karabakh, contrary to the position of Azerbaijan?
Again, if you could implement such a victorious plan, then you would implement it in Kazan? If you could implement such a victorious plan, then why did you not even the Russian plan? If you could prevent the war, you should have prevented the war in April 2016, or would have implemented your plan for victorious negotiations before the 2018 revelation.
You may argue that you would have surrendered 5 regions, leaving two regions to tie in with the status of Nagorno-Karabakh? That is a logical argument. But why did Azerbaijan have to agree in 2018 or 2020 to what it categorically did not agree to in 2011, when in Kazan it refused to sign the document agreed at the level of the Foreign Ministers? Let me remind you that at that time Azerbaijan was less prepared for war.
Another sensational accusation has appeared of late; it says that with my statements I deprived Azerbaijan of all hope of achieving a result through negotiations, which made war inevitable. Please look at it more carefully. It turns out that the whole meaning and purpose of the negotiation process that people have been conducting for 20 years was to give Azerbaijan hope that it could achieve through negotiations what it wanted to achieve through war. This is what I am saying. I say that the purpose of the negotiations over the course of 20 years was to instill hope in Azerbaijan's aesthetics, and in fact, I was the one to disappoint Azerbaijan against the background of said hopes. After all, which way and when would the strategy of instilling hope in Azerbaijan come to an end?

We instilled hopes in Azerbaijan, while it used to buy weapons and simultaneously recorded in various instances the "international discourse" on the resolution of the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict within the framework of its territorial integrity.

Conclusion
In fact, this part of the story treats of the reasons and factors behind the 44-day war. But, of course, it is also important to talk about the course of the war, the chances of victory and the reasons for the defeat, the signing of the statement of November 9, post-war events and, most importantly, the future of Armenia and Artsakh.
I will touch on these topics as needed. If it turns out that an article is still an acceptable genre for our society, perhaps I will do so in the form of articles. Time will tell.
I also realize that this article may be frustrating for anyone who is tired of discussing the past and wants to see the future. But conversations like this about the recent and not-so-close past are important to start an in-depth discussion about the future.

Youri Djorkaeff spends Christmas day with Artsakh kids

Goodwill Ambassador for Armenia, world-famous French-Armenian football player Youri Djorkaeff, Deputy Minister of Education, Science, Culture and Sports

Karen Giloyan and Chief Commissioner for Diaspora Affairs Zareh Sisaryan hosted a group of children from Artsakh at SoftConstruct company on January 6.

The children had an interesting time and received tablets as a gift to make their distance learning more effective.

The former France international, World and European Champion talked to children about the importance of education, emphasizing that it is the most powerful weapon, and noting that an educated society is the guarantee of a strong state.

The employees of SoftConstruct company presented a number of innovative IT solutions to the children. At the same time an agreement was reached to support these interested in IT technologies in choosing a profession.

I think of the Armenians of Artsakh on Christmas – French MP Valérie Boyer

On this Armenian Christmas Day I think of the Armenians of Artsakh – victims of a new genocide. French MP Valérie Boyer said in a Twitter post.

"I am thinking of Father Hovhannissian Hovhannissyan and of the Dadivank Monastery. I think of this threatened heritage. I think of these massacres of Christians. Let's not forget them, denounce and fight," the lawmaker said.

a dit qu'elle pense aux Arméniens d'Artsakh (Karabgh) qui ont subi un second génocide aux Chrétiens au père Hovanes Hovannessian de Dadivank.
